

PEAC 042

Human Rights Law and Advocacy

To what extent can a predominantly “Western” and colonial legal framework deliver justice for people oppressed by Western institutions? We will study how human rights are contested by people in different spaces and spheres, including states, corporations, NGOs, social movements, and civil society. Human rights are constantly being claimed, built, and remade. How does this matter in everyday life? We will seek to understand these dynamics from the perspectives of people most affected by this contestation, with a particular focus on the global South. We will thus emerge better equipped to engage with struggles for peace and justice.

Professor Michael Wilson Becerril

Tuesday & Thursday
11:20am-12:35pm

Scan to learn more about the Department of Peace and Conflict Studies

GLBL-core